

THE DREAMVISIONER – SYNOPSIS

By S. Leigh Young

What if you could sense the truth behind another's façade, perhaps receiving visions of a tumultuous past? Would it allow for more understanding and empathy for that person?

What if you received messages about crucial events from an unknown source, using a process you dare not explain, because it would cause others to question your sanity? Would you act on the messages, or try to ignore them?

Some people have an arcane ability to clear their minds of clutter, followed by a mental and emotional infusion of information. Jake Spencer, a thirty-nine-year-old widower, is one of these people, yet, he doesn't always understand it, or know exactly how to proceed, although he has very capable teachers.

Throughout his notable life, Jake experiences nearly every conceivable form of bigotry, emotion and conflict, as the reader participates in his self-growth, through a series of events, that often seem out of his control. However, he soon learns that he actually does have the ability to affect much of it, with desirable results. His progression toward a life of self-design, offers all who come into contact with Jake, to likewise learn these techniques.

The narrative takes us from the Capitol building, in Washington, D.C., where Jake is exposed to the shenanigans of lobbyists and politicians, evolving into a dangerous criminal plot which nearly consumes him in violence. He must learn who to trust, and who to stay away from. With the help of a retired FBI agent, Jake is cleared of any wrongdoing, while they work together to solve the evil mysteries unfolding in their midst. People are dying and Jake needs to learn if it is connected to the highly secretive report he is preparing for a prominent senator. This project, if made public, would surely trigger an upheaval in the status quo, beyond anything seen before.

The story then transports us into Jake's next adventure, working as a civilian for the same senator, following up on leads from whistleblowers involving government corruption. This new endeavor brings him into contact with many colorful and talented people, who assist him in his life plan. He meets a university physics professor through his daughter, who is one of the professor's star students. This new contact sows some new seeds, leading to his remarkable future, where he establishes a nonprofit foundation housed at a former plantation, that once belonged to a beloved elderly female friend. The plantation was built by her great-grandfather's former owner, a southern slaveholder.

A working relationship with a colleague, eventually blossoms into deep love and respect. Jake's second marriage becomes a central foundation of his life, while they work as a team to help others in prisons, homeless shelters and, eventually during a drastic event that results in a lengthy economic depression in the country. They are called upon to assist in a government-led effort to house millions of homeless families, while training them for new jobs and careers.

Overflowing with enlightening lessons based on universal laws, grounded loosely on scientific and metaphysical theory, the goal of the author is to explore some illuminating and thought-provoking techniques that some people have utilized in 'real life', although the underlying message is slightly enigmatic – 'real life' is not the TRUTH, but merely a dream.

I believe we are all DreamVisioners and I sincerely hope the reader is positively impacted by the chronicle of Jake's life.

Sincerely,

S. Leigh Young, a fellow dreamvisioner.
